

Every night in King County
there are over 1,000 children without homes.

With no job, no money and no place to go, Renee was afraid that she and her two boys, Justin and Brandon, would have to live out of her car. That's when the YWCA, a United Way of King County supported agency, stepped in to provide the food, shelter, and career counseling Renee needed to give her children the opportunity for a better life.

Each year, nearly 4,000 high school students drop out of public schools in King County.

Fifteen-year-old Terrell might be wandering the streets alone instead of learning the values of teamwork if it weren't for the Central Area Youth Association funded by United Way of King County. Developed for at-risk teens, CAYA provides supervised sports, tutoring, and job readiness training to help prevent school dropout and delinquency.

More than 36,000 King County residents over age 65 live alone.

For many lonely, low-income seniors, a television set offers the only channel of communication. But thanks to agencies such as the Northwest Senior Activity Center affiliated with United Way of King County, Eva and others like her are keeping active through recreational classes, holiday celebrations, and human companionship.
